

The FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections.

Indiana's Telephone Privacy law has improved my time at home by reducing the number of telemarketing calls we have received over the past year. I used to receive several calls a week. Now, I get less than one a month. We are very pleased with this reduction. Especially since I would never purchase from a telemarketer.

My family values our time at home together and interruptions from telemarketers, especially during dinner or late evenings, had us to the point of just turning our phones off in the evenings.

This is no longer a possible solution as we have family members in poor health. We have to leave our phones on all the time and I would be very upset if I started getting more telemarketer calls again.
